Q: How do I enable GTK_DEBUG in a C program without crashing? I wrote a program in a C language that uses GTK+. To debug my program I need to enable GTK_DEBUG in my program. But I need to do that without causing my program to crash. Is that possible? A: If you use `g_debug()` before calling `gtk_main()` then it will not cause the program to crash. Your question has been answered in the GTK+ mailing list a while back, the status is that the `g_debug()` function should be used. A: As I said in my comments, the correct way to do this is to use the `gtk_set_debug()` function. This will cause your program to crash if there is a problem, and cause a warning to be printed to `stderr` if the debug settings have not been set, but is far safer to use than `g_debug()`. This is because `g_debug()` will not handle errors at all (though you can obviously use `g_critical()` and friends), whereas `gtk_set_debug()` will cause a warning and a crash. Some people believe that pictures are worth a thousand words and so is this web space. A web site is a collection of all those web pages which have been compiled by an individual or an organization into a single access point. The terms; "Web page" and "web site" are considered as equivalent. Therefore, this site may be referred to as a web site and is intended as such. An on-line service provides information, services and uses computer-based technologies to provide consumers with a means to purchase products and obtain services. For example, on-line services such as on-line banking services and on-line auctions are widely used by consumers. Various on-line services and products are used by consumers. One such service is e-mail which is an on-line and often asynchronous, in-person form of communication. However, many e-mail messages are either too large to be sent as e-mail, or the recipients of the e-mail are not properly e-mail enabled. In either case, a message sent in the form of an e-mail message may be received by the recipient as

Q: How to give multiple values to a PHP function? I have created a PHP function that takes one parameter (returns a JSON response). This function is being used on the front-end (Electron, single page app) and it is being called each time the user changes input. How can I modify the function to also accept multiple values? Currently (w/o any multiple values), the function returns the following error: Cannot modify header information - headers already sent Sample: `function myfunction($param1, $param2){ $q = $param1.'.'.$param2; $json = array("status" => "0", "message" => "0", "json" => array("data" => array("Code" => "$q", "Name" => "$param1", "Unit" => "$param2"),`
