“With ‘HyperMotion Technology,’ we’re bringing a new dimension to both the flow and feel of football. It reacts to your actions as you kick and dribble, increasing the pace and pace of the game based on your actions and passing and moving the ball further up the pitch,” said Jeff Webb, Producer, EA SPORTS. “The speed of the game is increased throughout the entire pitch, from the goalmouth to the free-kicks, making it easier for you to predict the trajectory of the ball and tackle high-speed attackers.” Collecting real-life player movement data The data collected from the players helps create a more “realistic” and authentic experience, and in some instances gives the game an advantage over previous titles. For example, the data helps better predict how a player will move, including natural movement patterns when they sprint or kick after taking a throw-in, or predict the trajectory of a cross, touch-and-go kick or off-the-ball pass. The data also helps FIFA simulate how players might react when taking a challenge or counter-attack. For example, FIFA measures how the player would respond if a player takes a high tackle or heavy challenge, and it uses that information to make the game more authentic. (Credit: Electronic Arts) “Whether on goal or on the sidelines, ‘HyperMotion Technology’ will guide the player’s actions by measuring how the player moves. It learns their habits and the best ways to move, and it determines how to react to their movements, while also understanding the tactics and player psychology behind their actions,” said Steve Falco, Vice President of FIFA team development. “The data we collect is a measurable representation of the player’s physical performance – their strength and stamina, their reactions to shots and blockages, their speed and quickness, and their skill and range. It’s a quantitative summary of their capacity to play football.” Hear from EA SPORTS
